Scientists once thought that only human being had culture. But most of them now believe that animals also have some elements of culture. For example, some kinds of animals make and use tools, and the members of many species communicate with one another by means of signs. Tool making consists basically of taking something found in the environment and using it for a purpose other than its original function. Elephants break off tree branches and wave them with their trunks to whisk away flies.

Chimpanzees catch termites by peeling a twig and inserting the sticky, sappy end of the twig into a termite mound. When a chimpanzee pulls the twig out, termites stick to it. Young chimpanzees learn this method of catching termites from older member of their group. The technique is a cultural trait that has been passed along from one generation of chimpanzees to the next.

Many animals use various kinds of signs to communicate. For example, dogs bark and lay their ears back. dolphins communicate with one another by means of barks, clicks, whistles, and other sound. Scientists have taught chimpanzees to speak to people in sign languages. However, most scientists agree that any culture include the use of symbols to be considered a culture.

People who love music, who can lose themselves in a book, or who can spend hours painting a picture of a barn, know the deep satisfaction that can be found in art. It is not easy to express this satisfaction in words. But, in some partly mysterious way, works of art are among the things of highest value in our lives.

A fine piece of music, a masterpiece of painting, or a first - rate play has the power to capture and hold our fullest and most concentrated attention. We are completely wrapped up in it, and everything works out right. The music comes to the right close at the right time and in the right way. The play ends, not necessarily on a happy note, but in a way that seems inevitable and appropriate. As we grow more and more aware of the painting, its parts seem to belong together and to be made for each other. We percieve harmony in the object, and feel harmony within 43- The first paragraph is mainly about .....

1. people who know the deep satisfaction that can be found in art
2. people who live painting a picture of a barn
3. people who can lose themselves in a book
4. people who love music
