The ability to sense a shift in the relationship of the body parts that alters one's balance is required for efficient stability. The ability to compensate rapidly and accurately for these changes with appropriate movements is also essential. These compensatory movements should ensure maintenance of balance, but they should not be overdone. They should be made with only those parts of the body required for balance rather than with the entire body. Children's stability ability should be flexible so that they may make all types of movements under all sorts of conditions and still
